Circuit temporarily blocked the Trump administration's plan to end Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA). On Sunday, White House adviser Stephen Miller was interviewed on CBS's Face the Nation and said the "bottom line" is that the U.S. has a "moral responsibility" to "take care" of DACA recipients. When the Trump administration announced that it would phase out DACA in March, the president indicated that he'd put the issue on the back burner until he could address the broader subject of immigration. Since then, he's been weighing a number of different policy ideas for a DACA fix that would be popular with his conservative base. But, as the left has made clear, a de facto amnesty for a massive number of immigrants who have committed no crimes doesn't actually address the immigration problem. It's a short-term fix. As much as the White House would like to pass a full-fledged DACA replacement and protect the 800,000 or so young immigrants who've been protected by the Obama-era program, the plan has no chance of passing the Republican-controlled Senate. So Miller, when asked by host John Dickerson about the need for a broader immigration solution, indicated that the issue has become "more difficult" in light of the Senate's recent failure to pass an immigration reform bill. "The bottom line is that as a nation, we have a moral responsibility to take care of people who were brought into this country by their parents or their families illegally," Miller said. "And in the nine years that President Obama was in office, more than 2 million DACA recipients came out of the shadows, applied for legal status, and many were able to come out of the shadows and serve this country honorably." That's exactly right, but it's also not the reality of the immigration system. DACA is effectively an administrative amnesty because its beneficiaries have been able to avoid deportation proceedings for the last six years. Because of that, Miller's suggestion that the U.S. has a "moral responsibility" to provide relief from deportation to the 800,000 immigrants who've been shielded by DACA is flawed, because it ignores the fact that non-criminal immigrants can
