Written By: Nick Poulimenakos This past week, James Gunn dropped a bomb on Twitter by announcing that he was the director of the next Ghostbusters movie. It was an exciting news for fans and also for the potential of the franchise moving forward with new and original content. To this day, the Ghostbusters brand is one of the most iconic and lucrative of all time and its not hard to see why. In the past several years, the brand has enjoyed a renaissance with the reboot of the franchise in 2015 which saw the return of Harold Ramis as a producer and the cast of the four original Ghostbusters which included Bill Murray, Dan Aykroyd, Ernie Hudson, and Annie Potts. It was one of the most successful movies of that year and went on to gross over $330 million worldwide. However, the latest installment in the franchise, 2016's Ghostbusters: Answer the Call, came out to underwhelming reviews from fans and critics alike. In fact, the movie has a very low Rotten Tomatoes score of 10% and its sequel had been rumored to have trouble reaching the screen. However, when the news of James Gunn's role as the director of the next Ghostbusters movie was announced, fans rejoiced and many were excited to see a new and hopefully more successful Ghostbusters movie in the future. However, James Gunn's tweet has been somewhat controversial and many
